Research interests, vision and approach

I am a transdisciplinary researcher specializing in environmental governance and research impact.

My vision is to:

- Enhance the sustainability and resilience of peatlands and agri-food systems
- Change the way researchers around the world generate and share knowledge so they can change the world

My research builds on strong personal values, based on the generation of knowledge and impact through empathy. My approach to research is inclusive and collaborative, facilitating interdisciplinary and transdisciplinary teams to achieve novel insights whilst generating tangible benefits for society. My research and impact keeps my teaching on the cutting edge, so I can motivate and inspire students to affect change through their careers. I believe that now, more than ever before, we need to come together as a community to tackle the major challenges the world faces. This belief underpins my vision, gives me hope and drives everything I do.

Newcastle University impact case study (probably 4* according to Newcastle University internal review): Restoring global peatlands for climate benefits

Summary: Newcastle University research has contributed to the design and implementation of the UK's first ever private-public Payment for Ecosystem Service scheme to restore damaged peatlands, the UK's largest terrestrial carbon store, and has led to the promotion of similar initiatives by United Nations conventions and agencies. Research underpinned the Peatland Code, which generated private investment in peatland restoration, and led to over £100 million public investment in restoration to meet climate targets. Newcastle research has been instrumental in shaping, monitoring, and implementation of an International Union for the Conservation of Nature Motion, contributing to creation of new peatland policies in 29 countries, and has led to the integration of private-public partnerships in the United Nations' Global Peatland Initiative.
